7 cubic feet; 1 scrapbook; 1 oversize box

Organizational records and other research materials relating to the activities of CAJE and the history of the Jewish Community in Kansas City, particularly in preparation of the book, Mid-America's Promise: A Profile of Kansas City Jewry.

HISTORY:

The educational program arm of the Jewish Federation of Greater Kansas City, the Central Agency for Jewish Education (CAJE) initiates and offers a variety of educational opportunities and activities among Missouri and Kansas Jews to foster stronger understanding, appreciation, participation and engagement with their cultural and historical heritage. Established in 1966 (originally as the Jewish Education Council), CAJE collaborates with religious schools, congregations and agencies providing consultations, workshops, resources, observation/evaluation, personnel placement and many other activities and services. Believing that education is a lifelong pursuit transcending formal schooling, CAJE strives to empower and transform the Jewish community through inter-organizational collaboration, programs, and projects assisting the congregations and agencies respectively meeting the community's collective goals.

DESCRIPTION:

While the collection, in reflecting CAJE's mission goals, naturally contains a prominent array of materials pertaining to education (lectures, lesson plans, articles), administration (financial reports, directories), quotas, community surveys, company records (Kansas City Title Insurance Company abstract of title) and events (symposia, conventions, museum exhibits), it also features a considerable portion of archives dating back to the 19th century examining the diversity and vibrancy of the historical Missouri Jewish community via the newsletters and annual reports of fraternities (AZA, International Order of B'nai B'rith District Grand Lodge No. 2), women's organizations (the National Council of Jewish Women, the B'nai B'rith Women's Chapter 158), and the correspondence of various Jewish organizations (the Jewish Educational Institute of Kansas City, the Federated Jewish Charities of St. Joseph, H. Ehrlich & Sons) with multiple immigration organizations (the Industrial Removal Office and the Industrial Removal Unit).

However, the CAJE collection's overarching focus relates to the primary and secondary research of the Kansas City Jewish community undertaken by Dr. Joseph Schultz in the 1970s which culminated in the publication of his critically acclaimed book, Mid-America's Promise: A Profile of Kansas City Jewry, published by the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Kansas City in 1982. Concerning his secondary sources, the collection features various essays (some published in reputable scholarly journals such as the Missouri Historical Review and the American Jewish Historical Quarterly, while others are unpublished lectures used at symposia) pertaining to the history of the Kansas City Jewish community since the 19th century. Along with conducting interviews of numerous community luminaries (with an emphasis on educators and rabbis) for primary sources, Schultz also utilized journals, diaries, memoirs, letters, correspondence, and newspaper articles on both esoteric (such as the fragmentary journal of Elias Eppstein of Congregation B'nai Jehuda covering the years 1880-1883) and renowned Missouri Jews, the most significant being Eddie Jacobson, a successful businessman and old acquaintance of Harry Truman (their friendship dating back to their military service in the same infantry unit in World War I), whose persistent lobbying on behalf of the Zionist cause was decisive in enabling the President to overcome his prior equivocation and to extend diplomatic recognition to the nascent state of Israel a mere eleven minutes after its formal creation on May 14, 1948.

Additionally, the collection contains a scrapbook entitled "The American Past and Palestine Partition Ends" compiled by CAJE student Adrienne Joyce Asher which contains newspaper clippings chronicling U.S. history from the Declaration of Independence to World War II and the partition of Palestine culminating in the creation of the state of Israel. Notwithstanding the ostensible differences between these historic events, Asher deliberately placed them together "because the fight for a homeland for the Jews in Palestine and America's fight for a free democratic land has so much similarity."

Whereas KA1396 largely focuses on historical materials utilized as research by Dr. Joseph Schultz for his book Mid-America's Promise, KA1464, the subsequent addition to the collection, primarily features records pertaining to school administration dating back to the period when CAJE was then known as the Jewish Education Council (JEC). Consequently, KA1464 is inundated with forms, lesson plans, financial reports, directories, questionnaires, correspondence and minutes of JEC as well as other organizations, notably CAJE's affiliate, the Council for Initiatives in Jewish Education (CISE).

Nevertheless, in underscoring the periodic record overlapping between KA1464 and KA1396, the former contains extensive cassette and VHS interviews of numerous educators in the Kansas City Jewish community (teachers, school administrators, professors and rabbis) interestingly conducted contemporaneously with Schultz's own interviews in the late 1970s (although the collection does not indicate whether Schultz's research project inspired CAJE to conduct an ambitious oral history project or vice versa, though this is quite possible).

Additionally complementing this pattern is KA1464's containment of essays, articles, newsletters (The Synagogue Scroll, newsletter of Beth Shalom Congregation) and a M.A. thesis recounting the history of Missouri Jewry. Nonetheless, given that the preponderance of its primary source materials, with the notable exception of the Congregation Ohev Sholom 100th Anniversary 1877-1977 booklet containing reproductions of 19th century records, mainly date from the 1950s onwards, the division between KA1396 and KA1464's historical records, unlike many of their other contents, is defined via clear chronological demarcation.
