Biographical Note:

Frances Hurd Stadler (1917-2000) was born on December 13, 1917, to Katherine and Carlos F. Hurd. Stadler's father was a reporter for the St. Louis Post Dispatch and was aboard the steamer Carpathia when the ship rescued 700 survivors of the Titanic. Hurd interviewed the survivors, and his stories made the front page of newspapers across the United States. In 1938, Stadler graduated from Washington University and subsequently worked in the reference departments of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the St. Louis Public Library. During World War II, Stadler briefly worked as a stenographer for Bechtel-Price-Callahan during the company's ill-fated Canol Oil pipeline project in Alaska. She later married Ernst Anton Stadler in 1955 and was the archivist of the Missouri Historical society from 1956 to 1978. A founding member of the Association of St. Louis Area Archivists, Stadler was also the author of St. Louis Day-by-Day. Frances Hurd Stadler died on September 15, 2000.

Arrangement:

The materials are arranged chronologically.

Scope and Content Note:

A 15-page typescript title That Was No Picnic, written by Frances Hurd Stadler, documenting her experiences working as a stenographer for Bechtel-Price-Callahan's Canol Project, a $100,000,000 oil pipeline project to transport oil from the Norman Wells oil field in Western Canada to Whitehorse, Alaska. Stadler describes nightlife in Edmonton, Canada, where she was stationed, her duties as a typist, her co-workers, and the eventual demise of the Canol Project. Also included in the papers are copies of newspaper clippings recounting the history of the Canol Project, a German-language magazine article about Bechtel, and a St. Louis Post-Dispatch newspaper article about Frances Hurd Stadler's donation of her father's Titanic papers to the Missouri Historical Society.
